The best libraries are already self-supporting - whatever they do is the same as the local shops - bookshops, eating places and hairdressers. (or the university 'library' in some cases!) Other libraries might have a very limited service, as illustrated by the many hackerspaces round the world that do instead. (If you're wondering about the ones at the beginning of the disk, consider that the drive may have attempted to read them multiple times after the drive was first installed.) If you have an OS that supports repairing a damaged disk with a known good copy of the sectors, then you can use that disk as a backup, replacing the damaged disk with the bad sector backup when your primary disk fails.
